In inflammatory bowel disease, TNF antagonists are the cornerstone of treatment for moderate to severe cases. A certain proportion of patients will experience a disease flare during anti-TNF-therapy. Reasons for this include the progressive loss of biallelic expression of TNF locus, inappropriate biologic therapy (inadequate drug dose or poor drug adherence), concomitant medication, disease severity and misdiagnosis. Therefore, the decision to start anti-TNF therapy at the right moment (preferably before the initiation of the therapy) in a patient with inflammatory bowel disease is a critical decision. We review the relevant aspects for the initiation of anti-TNF therapy in inflammatory bowel disease.Q: JavaScript - can I include multiple views on a page (i.e. have web apps inside other web apps) I'm working on a web app for my network and I'm aware of the concept of 'web applications' (aka 'applets' on Java-based web applications), but I'm trying to read up on the possible uses of a web application that's inside of another web application (or more) so that when a web app goes to a web page that has a web application inside of it, it works more seamlessly. The main problem I'm having in my googling is that I don't know what to search for in terms of "include another web app in the same page". I'm sure I could keep referencing a book or keep searching the web, but those two things seem to quickly obscure my search terms. I would expect something similar to the include JavaScript code that you would use in your asp.net page, but I'm only finding people discussing the use of external web apps that aren't in the same page as the parent web application (ie. how to make the parent web app act more like a normal website). If I was to try to explain it in a different way, my question is, is there any way to load up content from a different web application without having two separate pages? A: You could use iframe, or the newer webcomponent. For iframe you need to specify the action
