Spreadthin is a single player adventure game. You play as a character who is in a vehicle that is headed to do a certain thing and you just happen to get stuck in the middle. You cant move and your vehicle is not being able to move for some reason. You must figure out what the issue is while in the vehicle itself. Features 3 types of weapons, each of them with their own limitations. No power ups or other items allowed. No direction either, you are forced to figure it out on your own by simply exploring the world, examining objects, etc. No tips or tutorials are given, you must discover and learn on your own. There is no narrative, no dialogue or voice overs throughout the game, everything is done using text, which makes a lot of sense since this game is based off of a Gopher novel. You will be forced to seek help from either members of your own team or different teams from the different teams that you run into, it's up to you. Think you can figure it out? Watch the gameplay and see! Enjoy!

Spreadthin is a single player adventure game where you enter the vehicle of your spaceship and head out into space to do a certain task and there is a certain danger to you. There are only two types of weapons, a very good weapon that can only be used once, a weapon that you have to reload, and a reloader. You are forced to complete a certain task within the time limit and no help is given, you have to figure it out yourself. The game is basically a "get in the car, close the door, and press the gas" scenario, you cannot use any items other than the ones you get in the car. The game is dark and atmospheric, with a lot of music as well. You must learn on your own. Enjoy! Spreadwhite is a idae Dimetroosauridae is a clade of small herbivorous theropods ("bird-hipped" dinosaurs). The name is derived from the Greek terms dimetros (little thigh) and sauros (lizard), in reference to the shortness of the legs of the first taxon to be placed in the genus Dimetrodon. The exact phylogenetic relationships among the various members of Dimetrodon and Triassic theropods remains uncertain. Despite the initial discovery of what was thought to be a single family of small bipedal dinosaurs, recent phylogenetic analysis suggests that it represents a polyphyletic group of taxa closely related to the Patagonia abelisaurids, although containing several members of Dimetrodon. Some members of the group have been placed in the monophyletic group Allochampsosaurus instead, meaning that Dimetrodon probably represented part of the lineage of the clade that eventually resulted in the coelurosaurians. However, Allosauroidae, which would include Dimetrodon, would be paraphyletic because of the inclusion of Anatosaurus, meaning that a close relationship can only be established between Dimetrodon and Coelurosauria among the Allosauroidae. Either way, the members of Dimetrodon have been considered the only relatives of the iconic species Tyrannosaurus, and have also been suggested to be descended from a much larger predator or omnivore. Taxonomy

The Dimetrodon, first described from the English locality of Lyme Regis by the Victorian fossil collector Philip Henry Gosse in 1839, was considered by Georg Brême in the early 1860s to be a single quadrupedal animal. Brême and Richard Lydekker distinguished several genera based on differences in the bones of the skull between what they interpreted as different neck lengths. After an initial identification of some specimens as the "deformed remains of the herbivorous sauropodomorphs" closely related to the ankylosaur Ornithomimids, a study published in 1868 by Richard Owen correctly classified the taxon as a theropod. While there were many specimens of Dimetrodon found at the time, it remained for amateurs to collect and dole out bits of the various material to smaller gatherings of palaeontologists in the late 19th century. However, because the material is very diverse, the only
