Listening

By CRISTEL HASTINGS

The night seems to be listening
To furtive little sounds—
To halting footsteps of a ghost
That makes its stealthy rounds
Seeking the names that once it knew
That now are carved on stone
And granite shafts that etch a hill
Where grieving night winds moan.

The night seems to be listening
For voices it once knew
And loved, and carried tenderly
Through vaults of midnight blue.
A moonbeam sifts through somber pines
Whose shadows make dim caves—
A ghostly light moves softly on
Among the silent graves.

The night is listening—the wind
Goes sobbing down the years—
Dawn lights the slender shafts with dew
But Night knows they are tears.
