

Hearst's

A Magazine With a Mission

VOL. XXXVI. No. 5

CONTENTS

NOVEMBER, 1919.

AUTHOR	TITLE	ILLUSTRATOR	PAGE
	"The Teacup Girl," Cover by Penrhyn Stanlaus
DR. FRANK CRANE	We Are the Sheep Now that everyone else has his labor union—even the actor—isn't it about time for Us Folks to organize?	CHARLES A. WINTER	11
SIR GILBERT K. CHESTERTON	Democracy vs. Diplomacy Just what do we mean by "popular government" anyway? Some facts and fancies about it as reviewed by the brilliant English satirist	RALPH L. BOYER	12
RICHARD WASHBURN CHILD	A Whiff of Heliotrope A story of a convict's love for the daughter who did not even know him—until of his great gift to her	W. T. BENDA	14
ELBERT H. GARY	Something More Than the Pay Envelope Plain facts about the labor problem by the greatest employer of labor		17
WALT MASON	Salesmen Who Can't Sell Me Anything Truths about human nature not found in any book on salesmanship	F. STROTHMANN	18
GOUVERNEUR MORRIS	Better Days Should Love or Science dictate our choice of mates? A story that will make you think	CLARENCE F. UNDERWOOD	19
F. E. BAILY	The Pink Frock in the Window When a girl is eighteen the world ought to be a playground for love	WILL GREFFÉ	22
MAURICE MAETERLINCK	Like a Blind and Drowsy Crocodile Can you be sure of guessing right once in 37 times? What a philosopher knows of the Laws of Chance	W. T. BENDA	24
DEREK VANE	The Claw of Africa The story of the desert's threat against the happiness of one man and a woman	BARON GAYNE DE MEYER	25
VICENTE BLASCO IBAÑEZ	Americans Before the Eyes of Europe What a great European thinks of our American soldiers	FRANKLIN BOOTH	28
SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE	Now that Religion is Dead? Why has the Church to-day a better chance than ever before to serve humanity?	W. T. BENDA	29
EDWIN BALMER	Resurrection Rock Of messages from the spirit world and of a man who is bent on finding out the truth	ANTON OTTO FISCHER	30
MARIE GANZ	Wild Joe and I Fight the Police The feeding of the five hundred—What Marie Ganz did for the homeless and starving	M. LEONE BRACKER	33
ARTHUR SOMERS ROCHE	The Clock With Golden Hands There is no pleasure in being a thief unless you have the nerve to tackle the impossible	GERALD LEAKE	34
ARTHUR STRINGER	This Light Must Live Who has the advantage in the war between the sexes—the man or the woman? Or neither?	JAMES MONTGOMERY FLAGG	36
JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES	Several Senators from Scattered States Personal glimpses of some public men worth glimpsing	GLUYAS WILLIAMS	38
K. C. B.	He Kept His Promise A successful man who remembered the pledge of his boyhood days		39
MAURICE LEVEL	The Debt Collector You may play the game against Society and win—but Failure may clutch you from within	HARRY TOWNSEND	40
E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM	The Box With Broken Seals Jocelyn Thew makes an amazing disposition of the documents he has carried across two continents	HOWARD CHANDLER CHRISTY	41
ROBERT W. CHAMBERS	The Smile of a Sorcerer White Magic and a young girl in a desperate conflict with the Black Art of the Yezides	ARMAND BOTH	42
MARGARET WIDDEMER	The American Speaks A poem of courage—and of obligation	VINCENT ADERENTE	45
GARDNER TEALL	The One Great Picture of the War The only American reproduction of John S. Sargent's "Gassed"		46
	The Play of the Month "The Challenge" by Eugene Walter—with an introductory comment by George Creel		48
	The Book of the Month "La Bodega," by the great Spanish writer, Vicente Blasco Ibañez		49
HENRY SMITH WILLIAMS	Science of the Month To Walk on Fire; Safety for Fishes; How Old Is a Father? Muskrats and Cattails; November 22d: Every Mariner His Own Horizon	McKNIGHT SMITH	50
BRUNO LESSING	The Eve of St. Agnes Great loves sometimes have small beginnings. This one happens on a park bench	EVERETT SHINN	52
B. C. FORBES	How Big Business Men Grew Rich The second largest fortune in the world—Andrew Carnegie's—started with an investment of $390		68

Ravenot stopped suddenly, murmuring, "How extraordinary . . . I can't remember!"

The Debt Collector

By Maurice Level

Illustrated by Harry Townsend

RAVENOT, debt collector to the same bank for ten years, was a model employee. Never had there been the least cause to find fault with him. Never had the slightest error been detected in his books. Living alone, carefully avoiding new acquaintances, keeping out of cafés and without love affairs, he seemed happy, quite content with his lot. If it were sometimes said in his hearing: "It must be a temptation to handle such large sums!" he would reply quietly: "Why? Money that doesn't belong to you is not money."

In the locality in which he lived he was looked upon as a paragon, his advice sought after and taken. On the evening of one collecting day he did not return to his home. The idea of dishonesty never even suggested itself to those who knew him. Possibly a crime had been committed. The police traced his movements during the day. He had presented his bills punctually, and had collected his last sum near the Montrouge Gate about seven o'clock. At the time he had over two hundred thousand francs in his possession. Further than that all trace of him was lost. They scoured the neighborhood and the waste ground that lies near the fortifications; the hovels that are found here and there in the military zone were ransacked; all with no result. As a matter of fact they telegraphed in every direction, to every frontier station. But the directors of the bank as well as the police, had little doubt that he had been lain in wait for, robbed and thrown into the river. Basing their deductions on certain clues, they were able to state almost positively that the robbery had been planned for some time by professional thieves.

Only one man in Paris shrugged his shoulders when he read about it in the papers; that man was Ravenot.

JUST at the time when the keenest sleuth-hounds of the police were losing his scent, he had reached the Seine by way of the Boulevards extérieurs. Under the arch of a bridge he had dressed himself in some everyday clothes he had left there the night before, had put two hundred thousand francs in his pocket, and making a bundle of his uniform and satchel, had dropped the whole, weighted with a large stone, into the river and had returned to Paris. He slept at a hotel, and slept well. In a few hours he had become a consummate thief.

Profiting by his start, he might have taken a train across the frontier, but he was too wise to suppose that a few hundred kilometers would put him beyond the reach of the gendarmes, and he had no illusions as to the fate that awaited him. He would most assuredly be arrested. Besides, his plan was a very different one.

When daylight came he enclosed the two hundred thousand francs in an envelope, sealed it with fixed seals, and went to a lawyer. "Monsieur," said he, "this is why I have come to you: In this envelope I have some securities, papers, that I want to leave in safety. I am going for a long journey and I don't know when I shall return. I should like to leave this packet with you. I suppose you have no objection to my doing so?"

"None whatever. I'll give you a receipt . . ."

He assented, then began to think. A receipt? Where could he put it? To whom entrust it? If he kept it on his person he would certainly lose his deposit. He hesitated, not having foreseen this complication. Then he said easily:

"Mon Dieu, I am alone in the world without relations and friends. The journey I intend making is—no without danger. I should run the risk of losing the receipt, or it might be destroyed. Would it not be possible for you to take possession of the packet and place it safely among your documents, and when I return I should merely have to tell you, or your successor, my name?"

"But if I do that . . ."

"State on the receipt that it can only be claimed in this way. At any rate, if there is any risk, it is mine."

"Agreed. What is your name?"

He replied without hesitation:

"Duverger, Henri Duverger."

WHEN he got back to the street he breathed a sigh of relief. The first part of his program was over. They could clap the handcuffs on him now; the substance of his theft was beyond reach.

He had worked things out with cold deliberation on these lines:—on the expiration of his sentence he would claim the deposit. No one would be able to dispute his right to it. Four or five unpleasant years to be gone through, and he would be a rich man. It was preferable to spending his life trudging from door to door collecting debts! He would go to live in the country. To everyone he would be Monsieur Duverger. He would grow old in peace and contentment, known as an honest, charitable man—for he would spend some of the money on others.

He wanted twenty-four hours longer to make sure the numbers of the notes were not known, and reassured on this point, gave himself up, a cigaret between his lips.

Another man in his place would have invented some story. He preferred to tell the truth, to admit the theft. Why waste time? But at his trial, as when he was first charged, it was impossible to drag from him a word about what he had done with the 200,000 francs. He confined himself to saying:

"I don't know. . . I fell asleep on a bench. . . In my turn I was robbed."

Thanks to his irreproachable past he was sentenced to only five years' penal servitude. He heard the sentence without moving a muscle. He was thirty-five. At forty he would be (Concluded on page 71) free and rich. He considered the confinement a small, necessary sacrifice.

The Debt Collector

(Concluded from page 40)

In the prison where he served his sentence he was a model for all the others, just as he had been a model employee. He watched the slow days pass without impatience or anxiety, concerned only about his health.

At last the day of his discharge came. They gave him back his little stock of personal effects, and he left with but one idea in his mind, that of getting to the lawyer. As he walked along he imagined the coming scene.

He would arrive. He would be ushered into his impressive office. Would the lawyer recognize him? He would look in the glass; decidedly he had grown considerably older and no doubt his face bore traces of his experience—No, certainly the lawyer would not recognize him. Ha! Ha! It would add to the humor of the situation!

"What can I do for you, Monsieur?"

"I have come for a deposit I made here five years ago."

"Which deposit? . . . In what name?"

"In the name of Monsieur . . ."

Ravenot stopped suddenly, murmuring:

"How extraordinary . . . I can't remember the name I gave!"

He racked his brains . . . a blank! He sat down on a bench, and feeling that he was growing unnerved, reasoned with himself: "Come, come; be calm! Monsieur . . . Monsieur . . . It began with . . . which letter? . . ."

For an hour he sat lost in thought, straining his memory, groping after something that might suggest a clue. . . . A waste of time, the name danced in front of him, round about him; he saw the letters jump, the syllables vanish . . . Every second he felt that he had it, that it was before his eyes, on his tongue . . . No. At first this only worried him; then it became a sharp irritation that it into him with a pain that was almost physical. Hot waves ran up and down his back. His muscles contracted; he found it impossible to sit still. His hands began to twitch. He bit his dry lips. He was divided between an impulse to weep and to fight. But the more he focused his attention, the further the name seemed to recede. He struck the ground with his foot, rose and said aloud:

"What's the good of worrying? . . . It only makes things worse. If I leave off thinking about it it will come of itself!"

But an obsession cannot be shaken off in a day. In vain he turned his attention to the faces of the passers-by; stopped at the shop-windows, listened to the street noises; while he listened, unhearing, and looked, understanding, the great question persisted:

"Monsieur? . . . Monsieur? . . ."

At last, the night came. The streets were deserted.

Worn out, he went to a hotel, asked for a room and flung himself fully dressed on the bed. For hours he went on racking his brain. At dawn he fell asleep. It was broad daylight when he awoke. He stretched himself luxuriously, his mind at ease; but in a flash the obsession gripped him again:

"Monsieur? . . . Monsieur? . . ."

A new sensation began to dominate his anguish of mind: fear. Fear that he might never remember the name, never. He got up, went out, walked for hours at random, loitering about the office of the lawyer. For the second time night fell. He clutched his head in his hands and groaned:

"I shall go mad!"

A terrible idea had now taken possession of his mind; he had 200,000 francs in notes, 200,000 francs, acquired by dishonesty, of course, but his, and they were out of his reach. To get them he had undergone five years in prison, and now he could not touch them! The notes were there waiting for him, and one word, a mere word he could not remember, stood, an insuperable barrier, between him and them. He beat with clenched fists on his head, feeling his reason trembling in the balance; he stumbled against lamp-posts with the sway of a drunken man, tripped over curbstones. It was no longer an obsession or a torment, it had become a frenzy of his whole being, of his brain and of his flesh. He had now become convinced that he would never remember. His imagination conjured up a sardonic laugh that rang in his ears; people in the streets seemed to point at him as he passed. His steps quickened into a run that carried him straight ahead, knocking up against the passers-by, oblivious of the traffic. He wished that someone would strike him so that he might strike back; that he might be run over, crushed out of existence.

"Monsieur? . . . Monsieur? . . ."

At his feet the Seine flowed by, a muddy green, spangled with the reflections of the bright stars. He sobbed out:

"Monsieur? . . . Oh, that name! . . . That name! . . ."

He went down the steps that led to the water, and lying face downward, worked himself toward the river to cool his face and hands. He was panting . . . the water drew him . . . drew his hot eyes . . . his ears . . . his whole body . . . He felt himself slipping, but unable to cling to the steep bank, he fell. . . . The shock of the cold water set every nerve a-tingle. He struggled . . . thrust out his arms . . . flung his head up . . . went under . . . rose to the surface again, and in a sudden mighty effort, his eyes starting from his head, yelled:

"I've got it! . . . Help! Duverger!"

Du . . .

The quay was deserted. The water rippled against the pillars of the bridge; the echo of the somber arch repeated the name in the silence. . . . The river rose and fell lazily; lights danced on it, white and red. . . . A wave a little stronger than the rest licked the bank near the moving rings. . . . All was still.