The New World

By RICHARD F. SEARIGHT

I dreamed I hung in ebon, star-flecked space;
And, through a rift in dense-piled banks of cloud
That veil this world like a colossal shroud,
Looked down into the planet's molten face
Where flaming vapors surge and writhe and race.

The clouds are seared by an unending blast
Of cosmic heat from gory seas below;
And painted crimson by the lurid glow
From lambent, gassy streamers swirling past,
To coil and undulate and sink at last.

Beneath the angry spouts of fiery spray
The blood-red cauldron bubbles, deep and slow.
It seethes and moans in an incessant thro
Of genesis, that by its pangs it may
Mold to a fairer life, though hard the way.
