

Harper's Bazar

Midsummer Fashions Number

JULY, 1926

Number 2565
59th Year

AVIS

TOUTS les modèles reproduits dans notre magazine sont la propriété de leurs créateurs. Les reproductions, imitations ou contrefaçons même partielles peuvent toujours entraîner contre leurs auteurs des poursuites de la part des créateurs et de l'Association des Arts Plastiques et Appliqués en France et à l'Étranger.

Cover, "La Chaleur et les Nuages," by Erté	Page
"The Elegant in Summer," A Portfolio of Paris Fashions by Baron de Meyer Photographs by Baron de Meyer 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69
"His Last First Night?" A Thrilling Story of the Stage, by Rupert Hughes Illustrated by John LaGatta	70, 71
The Tennis Frocks of Five Women Champions Dressed by Grace Hart	72, 73
"Why Not Brunettes?" More Chapters of Anita Loos's Continuation of "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" Drawings by Ralph Barton	74, 75
"Problems of Every-day Life," An Article on Human Nature by the Countess of Oxford and Asquith	76, 77
"Undelivered Letters," More Letters from a Spoiled American Girl to Her English Husband, by Cosmo Hamilton Illustrated by Wallace Morgan	78, 79
A Complete Summary of the New Mode Presented by the Paris Midseason Collections, by Marjorie Howard Drawings by Reynaldo Luza 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89
"Encourage the Horse-Races," An Article about the French Racing Season, by Drawings by Dwyer Rhys	90, 91
Snapshots from the French Races	92, 93
The Smart Accessories of the Moment in Paris Drawings by R. Jast	94, 95
"The Rocking-Horse Winner," A Gripping Tale of a Little English Boy, by D. H. Lawrence Illustrated by W. Smithson Broadhead	96, 97
"How to Have the Courage of Your Own Complexion," An Article Concerning Various Beautifying Theories, by Lucile Buchanan Drawings by Grace Hart	98, 99, 100, 101
Luggage Designed by Erté	102, 103
"Tampico," Continuing a New Novel by Joseph Hergesheimer Illustrated by Henry Raleigh	104, 105
Harper's Bazar Shopping Service Drawings by Walter Maya	106, 107, 108, 109
"Astral Friend," The Fascinating Tony Stark in a New Feat of Detecting, by Arthur Somers Roche Illustrated by Wallace Morgan	110, 111
Last Minute Sketches from Paris	112, 113, 114
Hand Lettering on the above pages by Maude H. Langtree

NEXT MONTH: ADVANCE FUR FASHIONS NUMBER

Harper's Bazar is published monthly in the U. S. A. by the International Magazine Company, Inc., William Randolph Hearst, president; C. H. Hathaway, vice-president; Ray Long, vice-president; Arthur S. Moore, treasurer; Austin W. Clark, secretary, 119 West 40th Street, New York City. Single Copies, 20 cents. Yearly subscription in United States and Dependencies, $2.00. In Canada, $2.50. In foreign countries, $3.00. (All subscriptions are payable in advance and at the fall price.) When you receive notice that your subscription has expired it is best to renew it at once, using the blank enclosed. When changing an address, give the old address as well as the new and allow five weeks for the first copy to reach you. Entered as the New York Post Office as second-class mail matter. Copyright, 1926, by the International Magazine Company, Inc., (Harper's Bazar). Harper's Bazar is fully protected by copyright and nothing that appears in it may be reprinted either wholly or in part without permission.

"Uncle Oscar took both Bassett and Paul into Richmond Park for an afternoon, and there they talked. 'We're all right when we're sure,' said Paul. 'It's when we're not quite sure that we go down.' 'Oh, but we're careful then,' said Bassett. 'But when are you sure?' smiled Uncle Oscar."

BY D. H. LAWRENCE

THE ROCKING-HORSE WINNER

A Story About Young England that May MystifyYou but Will be Sure to Grip You

Illustration by

W. SMITHSON BROADHEAD

THERE was a woman who was beautiful, who started with all the advantages, yet she had no luck. She married for love, and the love turned to dust. She had bonny children, yet she felt they had been thrust upon her, and she could not love them. They looked at her coldly, as if they were finding fault with her. And hurriedly, she felt she must cover up some fault in herself. Yet what it was that she must cover up, she never knew. Nevertheless, when her children were present, she always felt the center of her heart go hard. This troubled her, and in her manner she was all the more gentle and anxious for her children, as if she loved them very much. Only she herself knew that at the center of her heart was a hard little place that could not feel love, no, not for anybody. Everybody else said of her: "She is such a good mother. She adores her children." Only she herself, and her children themselves, knew it was not so. They read it in each other's eyes.

There were a boy and two little girls. They lived in a pleasant house, with a garden, and they had discreet servants, and felt themselves superior to any one in the neighborhood.

Although they lived in style, they felt always an anxiety in the house. There was never enough money. The mother had a small income, and the father had a small income, but not nearly enough for the social position which they had to keep up. The father went in to town to some office. But though he had good prospects, these prospects never materialized. There was always the grinding sense of the shortage of money, though the style was always kept up.

AT LAST the mother said, "I will see if I can't make something." But she did not know where to begin. She racked her brains, and tried this thing and the other, but could not find anything successful. The failure made deep lines come into her face. Her children were growing up, they would have to go to school. There must be more money, there must be more money. The father, who was always very handsome and expensive in his tastes, seemed as if he never would be able to do anything worth doing. And the mother, who had a great belief in herself, did not succeed any better, and her tastes were just as expensive.

And so the house came to be haunted by the unspoken phrase: There must be more money! There must be more money! The children could hear it all the time, though nobody said it aloud. They heard it at Christmas, when the expensive and splendid toys filled the nursery. Behind the shining modern rocking-horse, behind the smart doll's house, a voice would start whispering: There must be more money! There must be more money! And the children would stop playing, to listen for a moment. They would look into each other's eyes, to see if they had all heard. And each one saw in the eyes of the other two, that they too had heard. "There must be more money! There must be more money!"

It came whispering from the springs of the still-swaying rocking-horse, and even the horse, bending his wooden, champing head, heard it. The big doll, sitting so pink and smirking in her new pram, could hear it quite plainly, and seemed to be smirking all the more self-consciously because of it. The foolish puppy, too, that took the place of the teddy-bear, he was looking so extraordinarily foolish, for no other reason but that he heard the secret whisper all over the house: "There must be more money."

Yet nobody ever said it aloud. The whisper was everywhere, and therefore no one spoke it. Just as no one ever says: "We are breathing!"—in spite of the fact that breath is coming and going all the time.

"Mother!" said the boy Paul one day. "Why don't we keep a car of our own? Why do we always use uncle's, or else a taxi?"

"Because we're the poor members of the family," said the mother.

"But why are we, Mother?"

"Well—I suppose—" she said slowly and bitterly, "it's because your father has no luck."

THE boy was silent for some time. "Is luck money, Mother?" he asked, rather timidly.

"No, Paul! Not quite. It's what causes you to have money."

"Oh!" said Paul vaguely. "I thought when Uncle Oscar said fifty luck, it meant money."

"Fifty luck does mean money," said the mother. "But it's luck, not luck."

"Oh!" said the boy. "Then what is luck, Mother?"

"It's what causes you to have money. If you're lucky you have money. That's why it's better to be born lucky than rich. If you're rich, you may lose your money. But if you're lucky, you will always get more money."

"Oh! Will you? And is Father not lucky?"

"Very unlucky, I should say," she said bitterly.

The boy watched her with unsure eyes.

"Why?" he asked.

"I don't know. Nobody ever knows why one person is lucky and another unlucky."

"Don't they? Nobody at all? Does nobody know?"

"Perhaps God! But He never tells."

"He ought to, then. And aren't you lucky either, Mother?"

"I can't be, if I married an unlucky husband."

"But by yourself, aren't you?"

"I used to think I was before I married. Now I think I am very unlucky, indeed."

"Why?"

"Well—never mind! Perhaps I'm not really," she said.

The child looked at her, to see if she meant it. But he saw, by the lines of her mouth, that she was only trying to hide something from him.

"Well, anyhow," he said stoutly, "I'm a lucky person."

"Why?" said his mother, with a sudden laugh.

He stared at her. He didn't even know why he had said it.

"God told me," he asserted, brazening it out.

"I hope He did, dear!" she said again, with a laugh, but rather bitter.

"He did, Mother!"

"Excellent!" said the mother, using one of her husband's exclamations.

The boy saw she did not believe him: or rather, that she paid no attention to his assertion. This angered him somewhat, and made him want to compel her attention.

HE WENT off by himself, vaguely, in a childish way, seeking for the clue to "luck." Absorbed, taking no heed of other people, he went about with a sort of stealth, seeking inwardly for luck. He wanted luck, he wanted it, he wanted it. When the two girls were playing dolls in the nursery, he would sit on his big rocking horse, charging madly into space, with a frenzy that made (Continued on page 122)

THE ROCKING-HORSE WINNER

D. H. Lawrence's Story

(Continued from page 97)

the little girls peer at him uneasily. Wildly the horse careered, the waving dark hair of the boy tossed, his eyes had a strange glare to him. The little girls dared not speak to him. When he had ridden to the end of his mad little journey, he climbed down and stood in front of his rocking-horse, staring fixedly into its lowered face. Its red mouth was slightly open, its big eye was wide and glassy bright. "Now!" he would silently command the snorting steed. "Now take me to where there is luck! Now take me!"

And he would slash the horse on the neck with the little whip he had asked Uncle Oscar for. He knew the horse could take him to where there was luck if only he forced it. So he would mount again, and start on his furious ride, hoping at last to get there. He knew he could get there.

"You'll break your horse, Paul!" said the nurse. "He's always riding like that! I wish he'd leave off!" said his older sister Joan. But he only glared down on them in silence. Nurse gave him up. She could make nothing of him. Anyhow, he was growing beyond her.

ONE day his mother and his Uncle Oscar came in when he was on one of his furious rides. He did not speak to them. "Hello, you young jockey! Riding a winner?" said his uncle.

"Aren't you growing too big for a rocking-horse? You're not a very little boy any longer, you know," said his mother. But Paul only gave a blue glare from his big, rather close-set eyes. He would speak to nobody when he was in full tilt. His mother watched him with an anxious expression on her face.

At last he suddenly stopped forcing his horse into the mechanic's gallery, and slid down. "Well, I got there!" he announced fiercely, his blue eyes still flaring, and his sturdy long legs straddling apart.

"Where did you get to?" asked his mother. "Where I wanted to go to," he flared back at her.

"That's right, son!" said Uncle Oscar. "Don't you stop till you get there. What's the horse's name?"

"He doesn't have a name," said the boy. "Gets on without all right!" asked the uncle.

"Well, he has different names. He called Sansovino last week."

"Sansovino, eh? Won the Ascot. How did you know his name?"

"He always talks about horse-races with Bassett," said Joan.

The uncle was delighted to find that his small nephew was posted with all the racing news. Bassett, the young gardener who had been wounded in the left foot in the war, and had got his present job through Oscar Crosswell, whose batman he had been, was a perfect blade of the "turf." He lived in the racing events. And the small boy lived with him.

Oscar Crosswell got it all from Bassett. "Master Paul comes and asks me, so I can't do more than tell him, sir," said Bassett, his face terribly serious, as if he were speaking of religious matters.

"And does he ever put anything on a horse he fancies?"

"Well—I don't want to give him away—he's a young sport, a fine sport, sir. Would you mind asking him himself? He sort of takes a pleasure in it and perhaps he'd feel I was giving him away, sir, if you don't mind."

Bassett was serious as a church.

THE uncle went back to his nephew, and took him off for a ride in the car.

"Say, Paul, old man, do you ever put anything on a horse?" the uncle asked.

The boy watched the handsome man closely. "Why, do you think I oughtn't to?" he parried.

"Not a bit of it! I thought perhaps you might give me a tip for the Lincoln."

The car sped on into the country, going down to Uncle Oscar's place in Hampshire. "Honour bright?" said the nephew.

"Honour bright, son!" said the uncle. "Well, then, Daffodil?"

"Daffodil! I doubt it, Sonny. What about Miras?"

"I only know the winner," said the boy. "That's Daffodil!"

"Daffodil, eh?" There was a pause. Daffodil was an obscure horse, comparatively.

"Under!"

"Yes, so?"

"You won't let it go any further, will you?" I promised Bassett.

"Bassett be damned, old man! What's he got to do with it?"

"We're partners! We're been partners from the first! Uncle, he lent me my first five shillings, which I lost. I promised him, honour bright, it was only between me and him; only you gave me that ten-shilling note I started winning with, so I thought you were lucky. You won't let it go any further."

The boy gazed at his uncle from those blue, big, close eyes, set rather close together. The blue eyes stared and laid hands on him.

"Right you are, son! I'll keep your tip private. Bassett keeps it for me. I thought you were putting on him?"

"I can't except twenty pounds," said the boy. "I keep that in reserve."

The uncle thought it a good joke. "You'll keep twenty pounds in reserve, do you, you young romancer? What are you betting then?"

"I'm betting three hundred," said the boy, gravely. "But it's between you and me, Uncle Oscar! Honour bright!"

The uncle burst into a roar of laughter. "It's between you and me all right, you young Nat Gould," he said, laughing. "But where's your three hundred?"

"Bassett keeps it for me. We're partners." "You are, are you? And what is Bassett putting on Daffodil?"

"He won't go quite as high as I do, I expect. Perhaps he'll go a hundred and fifty."

"What, pennies?" laughed the uncle. "Paunder!" said the child, with a surprised look at his uncle. "Bassett keeps a bigger reserve than I do."

Between wonder and amusement, Uncle Oscar was silent. He pursued the matter no further, but he determined to get acquainted with him to the Lincoln races.

"No, son," he said. "I'm putting twenty on Miras, and I'll put five for you on any horse you fancy. What's your pick?"

"I should if it was my own fiver," said the child. "No, not the fiver on Daffodil!"

"Good! Good! Right you are. A fiver for me and a fiver for you, on Daffodil!"

THE child had never been to a race-meeting before, and his eyes were blue fire. He pursed his mouth tight, and watched. A Frenchman just in front had put his horse on Lancetot. Wild with excitement, he flayed his arms up and down, yelling Lancetot! Lancetot! in his French accent.

Daffodil came in first, Lancetot second, Miras third. The child flushed and his eyes blazed, was curiously serene.

His uncle brought him five five-pound notes in return to one. "What am I to do with these?" he cried, waving them before the boy's eyes.

"I suppose we'll talk to Bassett," said the boy. "I expect I have fifteen hundred now; and twenty in reserve; and this twenty."

His uncle studied him for some moments. "Look here, son!" he said. "You're not serious about Bassett and that fifteen hundred, are you?"

"Yes, I am. But it's between you and me, Uncle! Honour bright!"

"Honour bright, all right, son! But I must talk to Bassett."

"If you'd like to be a partner, Uncle, with Bassett and me, we could all be partners. Only you'd have to promise, honour bright, Uncle, not to let it go beyond us three."

Bassett and I are lucky, you must be lucky, because it was your ten shillings I started winning with."

Uncle Oscar took both Bassett and Paul into Richmond Park for an afternoon, and there they talked.

"It's like this, you see, sir," Bassett said. "Master Paul would get at talking about racing events, spinning yarns, you know, sir. And he was always keen on knowing if I'd made or if I'd lost. It's about a year since, now, that I put five shillings on Blush of Dawn for him, and we lost. Then he turned, with that ten shillings he had from you, that we put on Lincolne. And since that time, it's been pretty steady, all things considering. What do you say, Master Paul?"

"We're all right when we're sure," said Paul. "It's when we're not quite sure that we go down."

"Oh, but we're careful then," said Bassett. "But when you're sure?" smiled Uncle Oscar.

"It's Master Paul, sir," said Bassett, in a secret, religious voice. "It's as if he had it from heaven. Like Daffodil, now, for the Lincoln. There was sure as eggs."

"Did you put anything on Daffodil?" asked Oscar Crosswell.

"Yes, sir. I made my bit."

Bassett was obstinately silent, looking at Paul.

"I made twelve hundred, didn't I, Bassett? I told Uncle I was putting three hundred on Daffodil."

"That's right," said Bassett, nodding. (Continued on page 124)

THE ROCKING-HORSE WINNER

D. H. Lawrence's Story

(Continued from page 122)

"But where's the money?" asked the uncle.
"I keep it safe locked up, sir. Master Paul, he can have it any minute he likes to ask for it."

"What, fifteen hundred pounds?"
"And twenty! And fercy, that is, with the twenty he made on the course."

"It's amazing!" said the uncle.
"Sir, I would, if I were you, if you'll excuse me," said Bassett.

Oscar Cresswell thought about it.
"I'll see the money," he said.

THEY drove home again, and sure enough, Bassett came round to the garden-house with fifteen hundred pounds in notes. The twenty pounds reserve was left with Joe Glee, in the Turf Commission deposit.

"You see, it's all right, Uncle, when I'm sure! Then we go strong, for all we're worth. Don't we, Bassett?"

"We do that, Master Paul."
"And when are you sure?" said the uncle, laughing.

"Oh, well, sometimes I'm absolutely sure, like about Daffodil," said the boy; "and sometimes I have an idea; and sometimes I haven't even an idea, but I, Bassett? Then we're careful, because we mostly go down."

"You do, do you! And when you're sure, like about Daffodil, what makes you sure, Sonny?"

"Oh, well, I don't know," said the boy, uneasily. "I'm sure, you know, Uncle; that's all."

"It's as if he had it from heaven, sir," Bassett reiterated.

"I should say so!" said the uncle.

But he became a partner. And when the Lager was coming on, Paul was "sure" about Lively Spark, which was a quite inconsiderable horse. The boy insisted on putting a thousand on the horse, Bassett went for five hundred, and Oscar Cresswell two hundred. Lively Spark came in first, and the betting had been ten to one against him. Paul had made ten thousand.

"You see," he said, "I was absolutely sure of him."

Even Oscar Cresswell had cleared two thousand.
"Look here, son," he said, "this sort of thing makes me nervous."

"It doesn't, Uncle! Perhaps I shan't be sure again for a long time."

"But what are you going to do with your money?" asked the uncle.

"Of course," said the boy. "I started it for Father. She said she had no luck, because Father is unlucky, as I thought if I was lucky, it might stop whispering."

"What might stop whispering?"

"Our house! I dare our house for whispering."

"What does it whisper?"

"Why? Why?"—the boy fidgeted. "Why, I don't know! But it's always sort of money, you know, Uncle."

"I know it, son, I know it."

"You know people and Mother writes, don't you, Uncle?"

"I'm afraid I do," said the uncle.

"And then the house whispers like people laughing at you behind your back. It's awful, that is! I thought if I was lucky."

"You might stop it," added the uncle.

The boy watched him with his blue eyes, that had an uncanny cold fire in them, and he said never a word.

"Well, then," said the uncle. "What are we doing?"

"I shouldn't like Mother to know I was lucky," said the boy.

"Why not, son?"

"She'd stop me."

"I don't think she would."

"Oh!—and the boy writhed in an odd way. "I don't want her to know, Uncle."

"All right, son! We'll manage it without her knowing."

THEY managed it very easily. Paul, at the other's suggestion, handed over five thousand pounds to his uncle, who deposited it with the family lawyer, who was then to inform Paul's mother that a relative had put five thousand pounds into his hands, which sum was to be paid out a thousand pounds at a time, on the mother's birthday, for the next five years.

"So she'll have a birthday present of a thousand pounds five successive years," Paul's mother had her birthday in November. The house had been "whispering" worse than ever, lately, and even in spite of his luck, Paul could not bear up against it. He was very anxious to see the effect of the birthday letter, telling his mother about the thousand pounds.

When there were no visitors, Paul now took his meals with his parents, as he was beyond the nursery control. His mother went into town nearly every day. She had discovered that she had an odd knack of sketching furs and dress materials, so she worked secretly in the studio of a friend who was the chief artist for the leading drapers. She drew the figures of ladies in furs and ladies in silk and sequins for the newspaper advertisements. This young woman, artist, earned several thousand pounds a year, but Paul's mother only made several hundreds, and she was again, disaffected. She wanted to be first in something, and she did not succeed, even in making sketches for drapery advertisements.

She was down to breakfast on the morning of her birthday. Paul watched her face as she read her letters. He knew the lawyer's letter. At his mother's read it, her face hardened and became more expressionless. Then a cold, determined look came on her mouth. She hid the letter under the pile of others, and said not a word about it.

"Didn't you have anything nice in the post for your birthday, Mother?" said Paul.

"Quite moderately nice," she said, her voice cold and absent.

She went away to town without saying more.

But in the afternoon Uncle Oscar appeared. He said Paul's mother had had a long interview with the lawyer, asking if the whole five thousand could not be advanced at once, as she was in debt.

"What do you think, Uncle?" said the boy.

"I leave it to you, son."

"Oh, let her have it, then! I can get some more with the other," said the boy.

"A bird in the hand will suit two in the bush, Lad! Let's see Uncle Oscar."

But I'm sure to share for the Grand National, or the Lincoln, or else the Derby. I'm sure to know for one of them," said Paul.

SO UNCLE OSCAR signed the agreement, and Paul's mother touched the whole five thousand. Then something very curious happened. The voices in the house suddenly went dead, like a crowd of frogs on a spring evening. There were certain new furnishings, and Paul had a tutor. He was really at Eton, his father's school, in the following autumn. There were flowers in the winter, and a blossoming of the luxury Paul's mother had been used to. And yet the voices in the house behind the eaves of minutes almost-blossom, and from under the piles of present cushions simply, fell and screamed in a sort of ecstasy. "There must be more money! Oh-h-h! There must be more money! Oh, here, now, oh, now, oh, now, must be more money!" More than ever!

It frightened Paul terribly. He studied away at his Latin and Greek, with his tutors. But his intense hours were passed by Bassett. The Grand National had gone by; he had not "known," and had lost a hundred pounds. Summer was at hand. He was in agony, for the Lincoln. But even for the Lincoln, he didn't "know," and he lost fifty pounds. He became wild-eyed and strange, as if some-thing were going to explode in him.

"Let it alone, son! Don't you bother about it!" urged Uncle Oscar. But it was as if the boy couldn't really hear what his uncle was saying.

"I've got to know for the Derby! I've got to know for the Derby!" the child reiterated, his big blue eyes blazing with a sort of madness.

His mother noticed how overwrought he was.

"You'd better go to the seaside. Wouldn't you like to go now to the seaside, instead of waiting? I think, my family has been looking down at him anxiously, her heart curiously heavy because of him."

But the child lifted his uncanny blue eyes. "I couldn't possibly go before the Derby, Mother!" he said. "I couldn't possibly!"

"Why not?" she said, her voice becoming heavy when she was exasperated. "Why not? You can still go from the seaside to see the Derby, with your Uncle Oscar, if that's what you want. No need for you to wait here. Besides, I think you care too much about these races. It's bad sign, my family has been a gambling family, and you won't know till you grow up how much damage it has done."

"I shall have to send Bassett away, and ask Uncle Oscar not to talk racetrack to you, unless you promise to be reasonable about it; go away to the seaside and forget it. You are all nervous."

"I'll do what you like, Mother, so long as you don't send me away till after the Derby," the boy said.

"Send you away from where? Just from this house!"

"Yes," he said, gazing at her.

"Why, you curious child, what makes you care about this house so suddenly? I never knew you loved it!"

He gazed at her without speaking. He had a secret within a secret, something he had not divulged, even to Bassett or to his Uncle Oscar.

(Continued on page 126)

THE ROCKING-HORSE WINNER

(Continued from page 124)

But his mother, after standing undecided and a little bit sullen for some moments, said:

"Very well, then! Don't go to the stable till after the Derby, if you don't wish it. But promise me you won't let your nerves go to pieces! Promise you won't think so much about horse-racing and events, as you call them!"

"Oh, no!" said the boy, casually. "I won't think much about them, Mother. On needn't worry. I wouldn't worry, Mother, if I were you."

"If you were me and I were you," said his mother, "I wonder what we should do!"

"But you know you needn't worry, Mother, don't you?" the boy repeated.

"I should be awfully glad to know it," she said, severely.

"Oh, well, you can, you know. I mean you ought to know you needn't worry!" he insisted.

"Ought I? Then I'll see about it," she said.

PAUL'S secret of secrets was his wooden horse, that which had no name. Since he was emancipated from a nurse and a nursery governess, he had had his rocking-horse removed to his own bedroom at the top of the house.

"Surely you're too big for a rocking-horse!" his mother had remonstrated.

"Well, you see, Mother, till I can have a real horse, I like to have some sort of animal about," had been his quiet answer.

"Do you feel he keeps you company?" she laughed.

"Oh, yes! He's very good, he always keeps me company, when I'm here," said Paul.

So the horse, rather shabby, stood in an arrested prance in the boy's bedroom.

The Derby was drawing near, and the boy grew more and more tense. He hardly heard what was spoken to him; he was very frail, and his eyes were really uncanny. His mother had sudden, strange seizures of uneasiness about him. Sometimes, for half an hour, she would feel a sudden anxiety about him, that was almost anguish. She wanted to rush to him at once, and know he was safe.

Two nights before the Derby, she was at a big party in town, when one of her rubens of anxiety about her boy, her first-born, gripped her heart till she could hardly speak. She fought with the feeling, might and main, for she believed in common sense. But it was too strong. She had to leave the dance and go down-stairs to telephone to the country. The children's nursery governess was terribly surprised and startled at being rung up in the night.

"Are the children all right, Miss Wilmot?"

"Oh, yes, they are quite all right."

"Master Paul? Is he all right?"

"He went to bed as right as a trivet. Shall I run up and look at him?"

"No," said Paul's mother reluctantly.

"No! Don't trouble. It's all right. Don't sit up. We shall be home fairly soon." She did not want her son's privacy intruded upon.

"Very good," said the governess.

IT WAS about one o'clock when Paul's mother and father drove up to their house. All was still. Paul's mother went to her room and slipped off her white fur cloak. She had told her maid not to wait up for her. She heard her husband down-stairs, mixing a whisky-and-noodle.

And then, because of the strange anxiety at her heart, she stole up-stairs to her son's room. Noiselessly she went along the upper corridor. Was there a faint noise? What was it?

She stood, with arrested muscles, outside his door, listening. There was a strange, heavy and yet not loud noise. Her heart stood still. It was a soundless noise, yet rushing and powerful. Something huge, in violent, hushed motion. What was it? What in God's name was it? She ought to know. She felt that she knew the noise. She knew what it was.

Yet she could not place it. She couldn't say what it was. And on and on it went, like a madness.

Suddenly, frozen with anxiety and fear, she turned to go.

The room was dark. Yet in the space near the window, she heard, and saw something plunging to and fro. She gasped in fear and amazement.

Then suddenly she switched on the light, and saw her son, in his green pajamas, madly surging on his rocking-horse. The blaze of light suddenly lit him up, he urged the wooden horse, and lit her up, as she stood, bloodless, in her dress of pale green and crystal, in the doorway.

"Paul!" she cried. "Whatever are you doing?"

"It's Malabar!" he screamed, in a powerful, strangled voice.

His eyes blazed at her for one strange and seconds second, as he ceased urging his wooden horse. Then he fell with a crash to the ground, and she, all her tormented motherhood flooding upon her, rushed to gather him up.

But he was unconscious, and unconscious he remained, with some brain-fever. He talked and tossed, and his mother sat stonily by his bedside.

"Malabar! It's Malabar! Bassett, Bassett, I know! It's Malabar!"

So the child cried, trying to get up and urge the rocking-horse that gave him his inspiration.

"What does he mean by Malabar?" asked the heart-beaten mother.

"I don't know," said the father, stonily.

"What does he mean by Malabar?" she asked her brother Oscar.

"It's one of the horses running for the Derby," was the answer.

And, in spite of himself, Oscar Crosswell spoke to Bassett, and himself put a thousand on Malabar at fourteen to one.

THE third day of the illness was critical: they were watching for a change. The boy, with his rather long, curly hair, was tossing ceaselessly on the pillow. He neither slept nor regained consciousness, and his eyes were like blue stones. His mother sat, feeling her heart had gone, turned actually into a stone.

In the evening, Oscar Crosswell did not come, but Bassett sent a message, saying could he come up for one moment, just one moment? Paul's mother was very angry at the intrusion, but on second thoughts she agreed. The boy was the same. Perhaps Bassett might bring him to consciousness.

The gardener, a shortish fellow with a little brown moustache and sharp little brown eyes, tip-toed into the room, touched his imaginary cap to Paul's mother, and stole to the bedside, staring with glittering, smallish eyes at the insipid, dying child.

"Master Paul!" he whispered. "Master Paul! Malabar came in first all right, a clean win. I did as you told me. You've made over seventy thousand pounds, you have; you've got over eighty thousand. Malabar came in all right, Master Paul."

"Malabar! Malabar!" Did I say Malabar, Mother? Did I say Malabar? Do you think I'm lucky, Mother? I knew Malabar, didn't I? Over eighty thousand pounds. I call that lucky, don't you, Mother? Over eighty thousand pounds I knew, didn't I know I knew? Malabar came in all right. If I ride my horse till I'm numb, then I tell you, Bassett, you can go as high as you like. Did you go for all you were worth, Bassett?"

"I went a thousand on it, Master Paul."

"I never told you, Mother, that if I can ride my horse, and get there, then I'm absolutely sure—absolutely—Mother did I ever tell you? I am lucky!"

"No, you never did," said the mother.

But the boy died in the night.

And even as he lay dead, his mother heard her brother's voice saying to her, "My God, Hester, you're eighty-odd thousand to the good, and a poor devil of a son to the good. But poor devil, poor devil, the best gone out of a life where he rides his rocking-horse to find a winner."