Zaman's Hill

By H. P. LOVECRAFT

The great hill hung close over the old town,
A precipice against the main street's end;
Green, tall and wooded, looking darkly down
Upon the steeple at the highway bend.
Two hundred years the whispers had been heard
About what happened on the man-shunned slope:
Tales of an oddly mangled deer or bird,
Or of lost boys whose kin had ceased to hope.

One day the mail-man found no village there,
Nor were its folk or houses seen again;
People came out from Aylesbury to stare . . .
Yet they all told the mail-man it was plain
That he was mad for saying he had spied
The great hill's glutinous eyes, and jaws stretched wide.
